Found on Kodiak

by Ken Waldman

Atop a Middle Bay ridge, violet twilight, west peaks no longer shiny—time I decided. Some options: North to shore, a haven of sand and rock by bay; further north to town, lights, a ferry due tomorrow; west to campsite that promises fire, food, a tentative partnership with birds; further west to mountains, now haloed by wisps. Tired, hungry, I knew I no longer knew—and would never know—where I stood. I only knew this: surrender. What relief to know deliverance neared no matter what direction next. I unzipped my pack, found the water, drank the last. Recapping the bottle, I watched clouds crown darkening peaks far west. I began hiking that way, happy, alive having chosen for the night.
Sometime soon I'll reach camp.
When flames catch I'll sing.
